PRIVATE ENTERPRISE

These lines are written in the midst of crises; they will be read in the midst of a crisis of a different kind. The whole popular consensus of 1914 is almost upon the world once again.

At the time of writing the motives and results of Mr. Chamberlin's visit to Herr Hitler have not been made public. The move has met with almost universal acclamation. In certain quarters, however, notably in the United States towards Russia and not without reason, for one would not be at all surprised were the result of the talks at Berchtesgarten that Lord Runciman was asked to give to Hitler by negotiations that the latter threatened to take by violence. The fact is that the British Government will be asked to yield so much in concessions, that when the time comes, Hitler will be able to walk in without a struggle. Whether the Greeks can be assured to "pen its neck" is another matter.

We are all appalled at the threat of war. But do we ever stop to ask ourselves for how long the lives of millions of men and women have been ended by the preparation for war? Rearmament was the principal factor in the temporary economic recovery we are experiencing. Men are forced to live, only in order to prepare to kill. To-morrow they may die for the same cause. Such is the logic of capitalism.

But just because new and more terrible wars are the result of imperialism, we must at all costs break out of this parenthesis. We must not work tirelessly to free ourselves from our frightful view that there is anything either in man or nature which does not contain the possibility of human liberation.

Now that the fact of oncoming war seems undeniable, it should not be difficult to show the chain of cause and effect between a competitive economic system and the inevitability of ever-recurring war, to convince men that if they found their daily life upon the principle of a competitive struggle of all kinds, upon the struggle for survival of business against business in commercial rivalry; upon the struggle of class with class; upon the struggle of the struggle of Empire with Emperors, the war must at last become the all-and-end-all of all. For war is nothing but the state of economic competition. It is a "inside-out" competition grown from metaphor to reality.

The reckless individual initiative of a Hitler is the final, logical product of private enterprise. It is, if it fails, to pull down all with it, rather than sacrifice the wealth it holds.

THE SEEFUE HOUSE

When it was built, Weir House was expected to be an undistributed legacy for Victoria College. It would have been confidently anticipated, not merely good judicious at a reasonable rate, but also an institution round which would grow energetic action of its spirit in College affairs, and a personality of its own. The first of these hopes as yet remains unrealised the second is in the process of being obliterated.

Weir House has never had the chance of developing a personality— a chance which Mr. Weir bequest has shown was entirely a business concern, and that the spirit of the Weir bequest seems to deny that it should.

If it is to be regarded as a business concern, the students have their business point of view to consider also, and it is this. Weir House is, by virtue of the bequest, in receipt of a large sum annually. It is, therefore, ideally capable of receiving no comparable sum. Yet Weir House seems unable to procure funds that could be compared with those which have been got from the various hotels. The students of Weir House no doubt wonder why; and if the board is raised to 35/- will no doubt feel that they are not being given the value of their money.

Such considerations as these do not tend to promote a homo- geneous Weir House spirit. Unless and until the students of that establishment are encouraged to take an active interest in the day to day running of the place, by such means as having all responsible financial information placed at their disposal, and a more lively spirit of co-operation between the House and Management Committee developed by the latter, Weir House will not develop an individuality of its own. Until that has done, it will, through no fault of its own, not be able to prevent the play of factors it should.

STORM OF STEEL

There is modern war neither grace nor dignity. It is man-made inhumanity, unaccountable in its inception; beyond the ken of man's minds to imagine or understand. It is a war that started in the black of night and ended in the blinding light of dawn, a war that left no room for thought or reflection.

In this war, the steel of steel is the only law. The ironclads of industry, the后面的text is not clearly visible.
